WORKING STUDENTS

by Anna Jones

Recent research shows that about half of all American high school students have after-school jobs. Parents complain that their children have less time to do their homework because of their jobs. Joe Scott, owner of Joe's Restaurant in Boston, agrees that there is a problem. His young workers tell him that it is difficult for them
 5 to find time to work and do all their homework. Scott had an idea. He decided to make his workers an offer.

"I told them that if they do their homework in the restaurant before they start work, I'll pay them for an extra hour," says Scott. Scott's young workers were happy to accept his offer. Sara Parker, one of Scott's workers said, "I am much happier now. My grades 10 are improving because I do my homework." Scott says that the students work better now because they don't worry about homework.

Scott talked about his idea on a local radio program. Soon other businesses started making similar offers. For example, the Big Top Supermarket gives student workers a bonus if they get high grades. Both businesses and students are happy. Businesses 15 have better workers and students are better at school.
